FEWER DEATHS, SAME BRUTALITY

Pennsylvania's domestic violence fatality count in 2012 was the lowest it's been since 2008, although the numbers are still shocking. In 105 separate incidents, 110 victims and 31 perpetrators died. Regrettably, we cannot report any decrease in the brutality and senselessness of the deaths that did occur.

As usual, firearms were the weapons of choice in 2012; nearly 53% of victims were shot. The next most common method of killing was stabbing, which accounted for 20% of victim fatalities.

“This was a cold-blooded, preplanned killing. The defendant executed his wife, the mother of his four children, with casual efficiency.”

This year's fatalities included:

- An elementary school music teacher shot by her ex-husband as she played the organ during her church's Sunday service.
- A 17-year-old girl whose boyfriend is accused of deliberately wrecking the car they were riding in and sitting on her as she lay trapped in the overturned car until she was smothered to death.
- A 20-year-old woman beaten, bludgeoned with a shovel, strangled, drowned and buried alive. An ex-girlfriend and her new partner are accused.

Other victims were smothered, burned, poisoned, drowned, pushed down stairs, drugged, had their throats slashed and were bludgeoned with baseball bats, pipe wrenches and other implements.

Because Pennsylvania has no central database or reporting requirements for domestic violence fatalities, we relied on media reports and police data to compile this report. We based our count on information available at the time of printing.

We counted killings among current, former and new intimate partners and family members. We also included perpetrator suicides and killings and bystander and intervenor deaths during domestic violence situations. Perpetrator deaths are part of our count because they also are a loss of life and a tragedy that impacts families and communities.

We know that every year this report misses victims whose stories didn't attract media attention because they lived in poor, crime-ridden communities. It also doesn't include cases where the relationship between victim and perpetrator, or the perpetrator's motive, was unavailable.

We exclude unsolved cases, cases where no arrests have been made even if intimate partners or family members are suspects and child abuse and neglect deaths that the Pennsylvania Department of Public Welfare reports.

Sometimes justice is delayed for decades in domestic violence cases. A glaring example of that occurred in 2012 when a Pennsylvania man was finally charged with strangling his young lover in 1979!

We also know, from local advocates' anecdotal accounts, that some victims of domestic violence commit suicide in response to unrelenting abuse.

We mourn for all victims of domestic violence – named and unnamed, counted and uncounted. We dedicate this report to their memory and to the effort to prevent more deaths.

GUNS TAKE THE HIGHEST TOLL

Between 2000 and 2012, 1,320 victims of domestic violence were killed in Pennsylvania; 780 of those victims were shot. Every year guns top the list of methods abusers use to kill their victims.

In a year during which the gun control debate reignited over the tragic shootings of 20 children and six adults at a school in Newtown, Conn., PCADV continues to support strengthening state and federal gun violence prevention laws and remains firmly opposed to increasing access to firearms.

“He had a bullet with her name on it.”

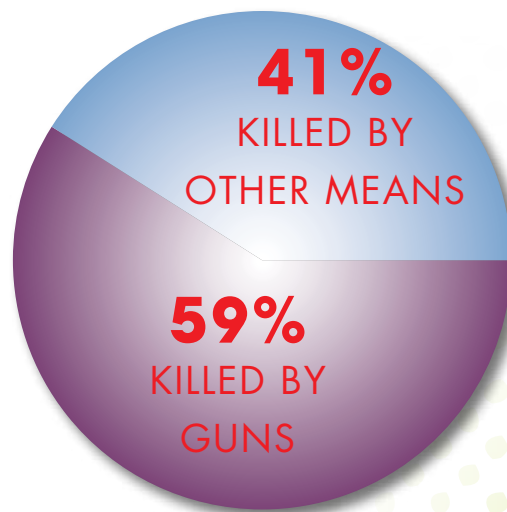

PCADV's Policy on Firearms

“Consistent with both our mission to end domestic violence, and the fact that firearms too often turn domestic violence into domestic homicide, the Pennsylvania Coalition Against Domestic Violence supports gun violence prevention legislation and opposes efforts to encourage domestic violence victims to obtain guns.”

A summary of each 2012 fatality, by county, is available at www.pcadv.org.

VICTIM DEATHS 2000-2012

A USA Today analysis of FBI records identified 146 mass shootings nationally, in which a total of 934 people died, between 2006 and early 2013; nearly half involved family members.

A separate analysis by Mayors Against Illegal Guns found 56 mass shootings nationally since 2009; 57% involved domestic violence.
